AUTHOR'S NOTE

The information and recommendations presented in this book are based on the author's personal experience. This book's author does not give medical advice, nor does he prescribe the use or interruption of a medicine as a form of treatment without asking for the direct or indirect consultation of a physician. He wants to offer information and not medical advice. The aim of the author is just to offer general information, that might help you on the road of seeking good health. The application of information and recommendations offered in this book, means to take over an individual responsibility.

All advice and procedures included in this book are not a guarantee of the author or publisher. The author and publisher do not assume any responsibility concerning the use of the information presented in this book.

“I do not recommend that you should avoid physicians, or the treatments indicated by them, or to interrupt those treatments.”

PREFACE

Just as the universe does not exist without the two sides of existence, just as there is no Yang without Yin, so are in our life positive things and negative ones. Otherwise, ...how could we be able to say about a thing that it is good if we do not know what its negative variant looks like?

So is man's suffering an integral part of our existence which, to a certain extent, proves beneficial by helping us to further evolve. Obviously, if suffering proves to be too much as to its intensity, there is nothing else left for us but to seek other ways of overcoming the deadlock and balance the two forces. There are several therapies in the world for eliminating suffering from our body, the only problem is to discover that variant which best fits our person.

In this way, only a major suffering, taking one to a maximum value of pain, may change these programs that were inflicted upon our mind along dozens of years of indoctrination, being capable of making us see the world from a different perspective, appreciate our health, exactly as it has happened in my case, making me write this book.

Socrates said: "He who wants to move the world should first move himself".

This study's author wants to suggest a new variant of a possible therapy which, however simple it seems at first sight, the more difficult it is to be applied.

Simple, as it takes only 10 seconds of our time (as long as it takes to write down 5 words on a piece of paper) but difficult because of our laziness, which hinders us to overcome certain habits and comforts that are deeply rooted in our subconscious.

The method described in this book shows the importance of the words we use daily and how they may influence our way in life, according to their connotations – positive or negative.

This book should be read particularly when we are at the best of our health and we can correctly weigh the received information. If you think that the moment you are suffering you will be able to read it and correctly assess it, you are deeply mistaken in your illusions.

Having a vision about a certain scientific truth, this book makes the universal nature seem ridiculous, completely ignoring logical thinking so elementary for the human being, with its laws of decency, which say that you cannot create anything... out of nothing. Nevertheless, I can only hope that by reading this book there will be enough arguments in its favor.

Having in view that no less than 150 years ago, our modern technologies could have seemed unconceivable, it is naive to think that we have already learned all the lessons about the Universe. Our epoch's paradox is that, in a society of information, man is ever more disinformed. Though we have access to a lot of information, we nevertheless do not know what is really happening around us.

The official scientific world clings to the old paradigms according to which the existence of our world may be fully explained through the mechanistic model of the Universe.

“Do you remember how people used to laugh about electrical currents (and now they are used by the whole world). Getting to know the human being is only at the beginning”

Albert Einstein

Note:

I want this book to make people learn primarily about the fact that there is a medical alternative called HOMEOPATHY, oriented towards the cause which produces suffering to the body.

Do not overlook chapter 5 which is a synthesis of various texts of homeopathic medicine and the works written by various homeopathic physicians.

INTRODUCTION

This empiric study appeared as a consequence of my need to solve certain medical issues through other ways, different from allopathic medicine, which in my case was unable to do anything.

My interaction with allopathic medicine left me with a bitter taste. I could only find its incapacity in the case of problems which did not fit into standard illnesses.

“The experience I accumulated while working in this community for 15 years, make me believe that any disease which an average doctor did not come across with, at the university courses, does not exist for them.”

*SHIRLEY TRICKETT: How do we treat candida
(Cum tratăm candida, Ed. Antet, 2005, pg. 15)*

Here, we obviously cannot speak about only one cause, but about several, which put together show its impotence: the great volume of work due to the big number of patients, few physicians, limited time granted to the sick men for making a correct diagnosis, the lack of research.

Personally, I think that each branch of medicine has its own place in our life, but the big mistake of people is their impotence to integrate all these branches into a universal medicine and people prefer for each person to try various “precise” therapies based more often than not, on healing just one organ instead of treating man as a whole.

That is why, in a world in which classical medicine fails more and more often, homeopathy seems to be a much more viable solution with lasting effects.

That is how I came to have contacts with this branch of alternative medicine, which is Homeopathy and I was surprised to find the lack of information that exists in this field, especially that from my point of view homeopathy treats almost all diseases.

The only condition is to begin the use of homeopathic remedies as early as possible, particularly because homeopathy can be practiced even from the first signs that something is wrong with our body.

Treat imbalances in your body with homeopathic remedies from the very first symptoms and you will be protected from the possible escalations in the degradation of your body which might endanger your very life.

My experience with homeopathic medicine in Romania was, from the very beginning, not exactly beneficial, when I found out its completely wrong application by some homeopathic physicians towards the old norms of homeopathy.

Thus, forced by circumstances, I personally came to study this field of alternative medicine, like homeopathy, as I did not find a homeopathic doctor who was practicing classical homeopathy. And after I studied it, I came to consider it the most viable therapy having the greatest chances of success.

Classical homeopathy is that therapy as part of which you are given a unique remedy and it is allowed to acts enough time for its effect to be maximum. A physician who practices classical homeopathy has to recommend one, or at most two remedies, after which the patient must go back to the doctor for another check-up.

Homeopathic remedies work no matter what the religious or spiritual orientation people have and they work even for those who do not believe in them, including for babies, children or animals.

The method, having close ties with homeopathy, will refer to the basic principle of homeopathy and to the manner in which homeopathic remedies are made.

A homeopathic remedy is obtained by taking a substance which, by progressive dilution into an alcoholic solution and by intensification/amplification (stirring the vessel), acquires therapeutic qualities of different powers according to the dilution level. This process called intensification makes the substances from which we started out to acquire new therapeutic properties. In this way, while it is swallowed, the homeopathic remedy commands the body to generate a certain frequency specific for the respective remedy. If it finds in our body another frequency of a reversed phase (specific to a certain disease), the both frequencies are mutually cancelled.

It is known from physics that when two identical waves, but of opposed phases, are being superposed, they annihilate each other, disappearing. From the therapy discovered by Dr. Rife at the beginning of the 1920's, and from the long-lasting experiments with bio-resonance, it has been long ago proved that each pathogenic element as well as each disease, shows a certain typical oscillation. If we superimpose an identical oscillation as to its frequency, but of a reverse phase with that of the disease or of the pathogenetic element present in the patient, the respective disease will be "wiped out" and shortly the symptoms of the disease will disappear.

The art of healing by using the homeopathic doctor method therefore lies in finding exactly the necessary substance and the proper dilution which, once it is swallowed, should find the exact frequency (of inverted phase) necessary in stopping the disease. For more details related to homeopathy, read chapter 5.

Since most people are not initiated in this field of homeopathy and understand certain terms more difficult, in this study we will use just the term of “power” when we will refer to the potential/dilution of a homeopathic remedy.

In the wake of profoundly studying the field of homeopathy, in my search, I learned about the existence of a method by which homeopathic remedies can be achieved very simply, by using just a little piece of paper, a pencil (ballpoint pen), a glass and a bit of water. Thus, I was curious to see if this method works.

Mention should be made of the fact that this method is not mine. I did only get to know it and by using it, to convince myself of its truthfulness and efficiency and to discover all its functional variants.

It is possible that very many of those who read about this possibility to “prepare” homeopathic remedies using just a glass of water, to wonder if there was any reason to further read this book, as they were unable to conceive that there is such a simple method.

This method is difficult to assimilate by people just because of its simplicity. Human nature has this tendency to complicate things and that is why, in a first stage, they vehemently reject the possibility of such a method to exist, which really works, entering into a real kind of “intellectual withdrawal” which blocks them, automatically leading to the impossibility of analyzing this new idea. In this case, the mental automatism has its say.

Albert Einstein said: “There are things we know, that are impossible to achieve, until there is someone who comes and does not know this and accomplishes them.”

Why this quotation?

Even if everybody learned at school that a certain thing could not be done, I want that those who read this book, before labeling it in a negative way, would try to be open-minded and personally study this method, even if, for many it might seem to be some hallucinations or inventions of the mind (particularly because for verifying this method, you need just 10 seconds a day).

I hope that it will be not hundreds of years until man will learn that the earth is not a square.

How does this method work, by which a homeopathic remedy materializes itself in a glass of water? Nobody knows. It is only certain that it works and was developed due to the remarks made in the wake of putting it into practice.

It might have a connection with:

- the high level of electromagnetic radiations in the atmosphere (particularly in towns);

- the oscillations of the Schumann Resonance, which show that something is going on at a global level and millions of people experiment this thing;
- the morphic resonance theory which says that once an impossible thing becomes by chance possible, it becomes permanent from that moment on, thus no longer being an impossible thing;
- the memory of water –which shows that water receives and registers any outer influence, remembering everything that happens in the space surrounding it (any substance that comes in contact with water leaves its mark on its structure);
- the present position of the Earth in the Universe – it is known that our solar system is constantly moving and that at present it is passing through a photonic belt;
- etc.

Nobody knows. But it is sure, that the water prepared in this way, after it is swallowed, has the same effect as the homeopathic remedies which we find under the form of granules in homeopathic drugstores.

Why does this method work?

It is not that hard to understand, because it was scientifically proved by the Japanese Masaru Emoto that
